In my 20s, I cycled to work every day over miles a week which meant putting on weight was still never an issue for me. Five typologies of experiments can be distinguished in the process of specifying, implementing, and evaluating computing artifacts. Tedre Feasibility experiments are performed to evaluate whether an artifact of interest performs the functions specified by users and stakeholders; trial experiments are more specific experiments carried out to evaluate isolated capabilities of the system given some set of initial conditions; field experiment are performed in real environments and not in simulated ones; comparison experiments test similar artifacts, instantiating in different ways the same function, to evaluate which instantiation better performs the desired function both in real-like and real environments; finally, controlled experiments are used to appraise advanced hypotheses on the behaviors of the testing artifact.
