Writing from Santiago, the provincial of the Dominican Order argued that the Spaniards of Chile lived in the countryside only a few months each year, when their agricultural pursuits so required, and that the rest of the year they inhabited proper communities. Herein, we scrutinize some oft-cited assumptions in this topic-which include the labelling of the process as biomimetic, the debate regarding the industrial viability of direct methane-oxidation systems and the claim that methane is difficult to activate-and delineate the extent to which these are scientifically robust.
